About the Seminar

Universities today stand at the crossroads of knowledge creation and societal transformation. As institutions that shape not only intellectual growth but also social values, they hold a unique responsibility to guide humanity towards a sustainable future. The urgent challenges of climate change, biodiversity loss, resource depletion, environmental degradation, and ecological imbalance have placed sustainability at the centre of global higher education reforms. The role of universities extends beyond imparting degrees; they are expected to emerge as living laboratories of sustainability, where theory, practice, and community engagement converge.

This International Online Seminar on “Greening Higher Education: Strategies for Sustainable Universities” aims to provide a vibrant platform for academics, researchers, policymakers, administrators, students, industry leaders, and sustainability experts from across the globe. The seminar will facilitate deep discussions, critical reflections, and collaborative ideation on how higher education institutions can embed sustainability into their structures, cultures, and practices.

This seminar envisions higher education not merely as a pathway to employment but as a transformative force that equips individuals with the knowledge, skills, values, and ethical grounding required to create a more just, equitable, and ecologically balanced society. By weaving sustainability into curriculum reform, campus governance, research, and community outreach, universities can become catalysts of positive environmental and social change.
